More About: Today, University of Tennessee Extension horticulturists Eva Bonnabraser, left, and Jane Jackson finish watering the LSU Southeastern Multi-Species Weed Management Mix. The mix is an additive seed treatment for Bermuda grass to control downy mildew and other weeds. Botanists at the University of Tennessee at Chattanooga (UTC) have identified a powdery mildew disease that can ruin an Oklahoma rice crop. The new rice powdery mildew (PM) disease can cause the plants to flower, but not produce grain, according to scientists with the University of Tennessee, the University of Arkansas and the University of Nebraska. "I am growing rice in Arkansas, and we have PM disease on half the plots where we have sprayed a fungicide. The next year, the same disease is back," said assistant professor of phytopathology Nedra Hanson. So, the question is, how can you control downy mildew on rice? "Rice is most vulnerable to PM when we are in the flowering stage," said associate professor of plant pathology Bobbi Hall. "We thought it would be best to target that period." Using the University of Tennessee's Zerene Systems CropView™ pesticide sprayer, Hailey Durham of NutriTech IPM in Adamsville, Tenn., sprayed plots of rice seedlings with PM disease. "The plants were stunted," said associate professor of entomology and weed management Jerry Graham. "The control in this trial was very good." After spraying, each plot was covered with small mesh bags, as the researchers sought to keep the insects from feeding on the powdery mildew. "We also sprayed the whole bed with an insecticide and a fungicide," Hall said. After three weeks, the bed was hosed down to remove the insecticide and fungus, according to Hohenlohe. "We waited 10 days and then we removed the bags," he said. "The rice was dead after 10 days, but no traces of PM were found." Although the fungicide is available for weed and vegetable applications, the researchers said this is the first report of its use on a rice crop. "We have applied it on canola, wheat and peas, and we are now working on
